

Test Article

Roman Anthony put together the strong start to the season in Triple-A Worcester that the Boston Red Sox needed to see.

He's hitting the ball harder than any player in the system. He's hitting the ball to all fields. He's continued a professional presence with maturity beyond his years at just 20 years old. Oh, and he slugged a leadoff home run and a grand slam Thursday.

What's left for the Red Sox to promote him?

Anthony sports a .300 average with an OPS over 1.000 to start the season at Triple-A. He's ready to play a big-league outfield and show off his prowess at the plate. The wondering of when he'll debut after such production is more than valid. While it's hard to project exactly when the Red Sox will make that call, there's signs to follow of when that storm could be coming.

Boston has exercised some patterns for in-season promotions in the past, especially when the organization tried to cater to the timing of the prospect's readiness. If that trend continues, keep an eye out for these developments around the Red Sox.